NEWS BRIEF – 019 –The Durban Forest

SANS has received details of a new book to be published shortly which members may be interested in acquiring. Other than advising our members SANS has no direct association with this project but Elsa Pooley is our guest speaker in September so may well provide the opportunity to learn about the book then and as a society we are keen to support environmental matters that benefit our community.

The Durban Botanic Garden Trust has just published a NEW Book called The Durban Forest which will be launched in the first week of September 2015.

Publication of this book has been timed to coincide with National Arbour Week which is the first week in September and in time for the World Forestry Congress (WFC) which is taking place at the ICC in Durban, South Africa from 7-11 September 2015.

Durban Botanic Gardens Trust

For a sustainable urban future to be possible, a new botanical discipline is needed to deepen our understanding of the relation between People and Plants. This discipline will link environmental management concerns with those of human welfare and wellbeing in a specifically urban context to achieve both ecological restoration and social redress. The Durban Botanic Gardens Trust has published The Durban Forest as an early effort to establish a manifesto for this much-needed new discipline, and provides both historical and forward-looking perspectives on the changing relations between natural areas and urban dwellers. These relations urgently await our exploration if we are to face the challenges of accelerating urbanism and environmental change that are now upon us.

The Durban Forest will appeal to all those interested in people and the environment, culture and community, our past and our future. Most of all, it will speak to the Durban of tomorrow and suggest a new kind of Botany that will help to build a future for all Durban's residents that is environmentally, socially and economically more just and more secure.
